Half of Moderna's New Coronavirus Vaccine is Owned by US National Institutes of Health

Axios and Public Citizen have obtained new documents suggesting that the National Institutes of Health (NIH) owns half of the key patent on Moderna's up-and-coming vaccine for the Wuhan coronavirus (COVID-19).

Should the vaccine come to market, the NIH will reportedly collect half of the royalties associated with its distribution. At the same time, four NIH scientists have filed provisional patents on their own claiming to be "co-inventors" of the experimental jab.

Many people do not know this, but the current cap on royalties for agency scientists who help develop a vaccine is set at $150,000. This means that there is a financial incentive to attach one's name to vaccine development, incentivizing the creation of potentially useless and dangerous new drugs.

This discovery by Axios and Public Citizen probably explains why National Institutes of Allergy and Infectious Diseases (NIAID) head Anthony Fauci moved Moderna's vaccine for the Wuhan coronavirus (COVID-19) to the front of the line, despite there being many other candidates vying for a piece of pie.

Amazingly, Fauci allowed Moderna to skip animal trials entirely and move straight to human trials. This was a potentially life-threatening decision that will now put thousands or even millions of human lives at risk.

"Every prior coronavirus vaccine has proven problematic and can be lethal to animals due to COVID's unique penchant for 'pathogenic priming,'" reports Children's Health Defense (CHD). "Death occurs only after a vaccinated animal encounters the wild virus."

First one billion doses of Moderna's experimental coronavirus vaccine in the works, despite the jab killing people

Many scientists and public health advocates have criticized Fauci over this decision, which they have dubbed as reckless. But this did not stop him from awarding the company a whopping $483 million grant through the Biomedical Advanced Research and Development Authority (BARDA), which is said to be a sister agency to the NIH.

This massive cash infusion resulted in Moderna CEO Steve Bancel becoming a billionaire, despite the fact that his company has never once brought a product to market, or even gotten a product to receive market approval. Bill Gates also became a little bit richer than he already was because of the deal, seeing as how Gates is a co-investor in the scam.

As you may recall, Fauci even went so far as to publicly praise Moderna's Phase 1 clinical trials, which turned out to be a total disaster. Despite 20 percent of the "high-dose" group and six percent of the "low-dose" group developing "severe or medically significant" reactions after being vaccinated, Fauci announced that he was "encouraged" by the findings.

“Fauci painted lipstick on that lame donkey and now he’s trying to convince everyone it’s a thoroughbred,” reports CHD, noting that Moderna and the NIH are already on track to begin manufacturing the first one billion doses of this deadly vaccine starting this month.

Anyone who agrees to take this Moderna vaccine once it is released will have done next to no research on the subject, as all of this information is now public knowledge. This injectable drug is a total scam, and the world will have Fauci to blame for unleashing it.

“Fauci knows from experience that no matter how dangerous a vaccine, the easy part is convincing people to take it,” CHD concludes. “Pharma, after all, controls the media.”

In truth, Moderna’s experimental Wuhan coronavirus (COVID-19) vaccine has nothing to do with helping people, and everything to do with making Fauci and his buddies rich. This is why the whole operation has been dubbed a pump-and-dump scam for greedy investors.
