People on the volcano-stricken island of St. Vincent have been told by the country's Prime Minister that they won't be rescued if they haven't taken the COVID vaccine.

Yes, really.

Cruise ships were dispatched to evacuate the island after the 4,000-foot high volcano La Soufrière erupted on Friday.

However, Ralph Gonsalves, the Prime Minister of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, gave a press conference warning that those who hadn't taken the jab would be left to fend for themselves.

"The chief medical officer would be identifying the persons already vaccinated so that we can get them on the ship," Gonsalves said.

16,000 people are being evacuated from the 'red zone' areas of the island that are most at risk, but that number won't include those who for whatever reason haven't taken the shot.

"If people are willing to welcome you at a time of COVID-19, they will wish you to have the highest level of protection possible," Gonsalves told the media.

According to local officials, some people don't want to be evacuated because they are scared they'll be forced to take the vaccine.

This is another example of how vaccination status is being used by governments around the world to deny people basic necessities, including being rescued from a natural disaster.

Numerous countries are preparing to implement vaccine passports which would deny the unvaccinated from entering certain venues, which could eventually extend to pubs, restaurants, cinemas and shops.
