The Moral Case Against Lockdowns: Governments Have Given Themselves the Power to Play God | The Blood-Stained History of Vaccines and Pharmaceuticals

“Let me tell you, as an anti-vaxxer myself, who we really are. We are people who have been severely damaged by vaccines. We are mothers who watched our perfectly-healthy children regress after being vaccinated. We are children who bang our heads against walls because we’re living in agony and can’t put our pain into words.

We are individuals from all walks of life who looked into the blood-stained history of vaccines and pharmaceutical companies. We are people who are tired, who are absolutely fucking done being bullied by monkeys in lab coats into injecting our children with chronic disease.”

Is it moral to sacrifice the lives of a few to save the lives of many?

If so, who has the moral authority to choose who lives or dies?

This moral dilemma was answered in the aftermath of the second World War, when the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights where “it forbids government from sacrificing some people for the benefits of others”.

Unfortunately, this lesson from history has been forgotten as we see governments completely disregard the human rights of people around the world with lockdowns.

Governments have given themselves the power to play God with our lives.

Governments, doctors and scientists have been encouraging people to sacrifice themselves for an alleged greater good.

One egregious example of this is the dismissal of VAERS (Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System).

Doctors are lying and suppressing information about the effects of the covid-19 vaccine in order to decrease vaccine hesitancy. These people are slandering both their professional colleagues and victims of vaccine injuries for their own moral superiority.

No one is infallible, neither government or health professionals.

For this reason we must educate ourselves, for we alone are the bearers of the consequences of our choices.
