

The Virus That Isn't There Has a Hypnotic Effect

I have written several recent articles documenting the fact that the COVID virus is missing in action. [1] [2] [3] [4]

And when I say missing, I'm talking about two MAJOR confessions, from both the CDC and a group of study-authors in Europe...and in each case, these people were in the process of assembling instructions on how to perform the diagnostic PCR test for that very virus. The virus they said they didn't have.

They didn't have it because they couldn't get it.

They couldn't get it because no one had it.

In other words, the existence of the COVID virus is unproven.

Now, I want to point out three factors that produce a hypnotic effect. Even in the absence of the virus, these factors seem to indicate the virus "must exist." I'm not talking about government or media pronouncements, which are obvious.

ONE: Scientists and public health agencies claim they've ISOLATED the virus.

There is no reason to believe them. The term "isolation" is thrown around like a politician throws around the term, "the people."

Isolation of a virus SHOULD mean it is separated out from all the genetic, cellular, microbial, and waste material that surrounds it. But don't assume, when professionals are talking or writing, that this is what they DO mean. Do not assume that.

For example, they often mean: "We have the virus in a dish in the lab. The soup in the dish contains human cells, chemicals, drugs, and other material. However, we know the virus is there and growing, because it is killing the human cells..."

Wrong. There is more than sufficient non-viral substance in the soup that could be doing the cell-killing. And obviously, "the virus" in the dish is surrounded by this mix of material. It is far from isolated.

And, as I've documented in a previous article, if the CDC, one of the biggest public health agencies in the world, couldn't get the virus, as of July of this year, and admitted it in writing..."the virus" isn't isolated.

TWO: This hypnotic effect ropes in some of the brightest medical and scientific professionals, who otherwise challenge all sorts of medical dogma. It is: "The genetic sequence of the virus is well established. Many studies confirm this."

Well, sure. If experts have mapped out the genetic structure of the virus, the virus must exist. Right?

Wrong. The sequence is INFERRED. It is ASSUMED.

Inferred from what? The genetic sequence could be cobbled together from several sources: the unseparated material "in the dish in the lab"; a piece or pieces of RNA that have been arbitrarily chosen as "relevant clues"; a piece or pieces of synthetic RNA that, again, have been arbitrarily selected according to a bias in favor of a certain type of virus.

Bias? What does that mean? I'll explain. When a few dozen people in Wuhan fell ill, back in 2019, there were a million ways researchers could have gone, in trying to figure out the cause.

Of course, as I've written, they could have looked out their windows and observed the horrific air pollution hanging over the city, and realized these "unexplained cases" of pneumonia had a ridiculously simple origin. [5] But no.

The researchers opted, as they always do, for a "new virus." And, they chose, without a shred of evidence, to "look for" a germ from the coronavirus family. That was the pre-planned story. That was the bias.

From that point on, the die was cast. The "genetic sequencing" involved cobbling together, by assumption and inference, a collage of INFORMATION, into code, which would satisfy the pre-ordained scenario.

They ASSEMBLED a genetic sequence that matched what they were going for: a coronavirus.

Don't imagine genetic sequencing is performed by people looking directly at a virus through a cosmic microscope and jotting down the names of rows of genes sitting side by side like cars in a supermarket parking lot.

THREE: The other hypnotic factor is the PCR test. "If the test exists to detect the virus, the virus must exist."

Wrong. The test—which has irreparable and fatal flaws, as I've documented—is working, at best, from a fragment of RNA which is ASSUMED to come from the virus. If the test appears to identify that fragment as "relevant," the test result claims the person is "infected."

People believe the test must mean something. And the only thing it could mean is: it finds the virus in a person, or the virus isn't in that person's body. But either way, the virus is real.

Wrong.

The deck is stacked. The game is rigged. Welcome to the Deep Medical State.

As in any truly deep operation, only a small number of elite professionals understand the basic con. The rest are blind, and accepting. Some are willfully blind. They see the truth in a flash of insight, and then they shut up.

However, in this mad "COVID landscape," minds and doors are opening. The hypnotic haze is receding. The truth is coming out. Doctors, scientists, reporters, and members of the public are discovering and rejecting the Big Con.
